All commercial computer software used at Texas A&M University-Kingsville must be appropriately licensed. The various licensing agreements will be maintained by the department in which the software is used, or by Computing and Information Services (CIS) for software installed in CIS-operated general access laboratories. CIS will also maintain the software licenses for software installed on general access information resources.

Public domain software, shareware, or other software not owned by Texas A&M University-Kingsville will not be installed on university-owned information resources unless approved by an appropriate authority, at the department level or in CIS, based upon an examination of the terms and conditions of the software’s license.

Unauthorized copying, installation, or use of software beyond that allowed in the software’s license agreement is strictly prohibited. Computing resources, including microcomputers will be checked on a regular basis by CIS or an appropriate authority at the department level. Unlicensed or unauthorized software will be removed by CIS or other appropriate authority at the department level when discovered.
