

Composer Diversity in Solo Vocal Repertoire Assignments

Victoria Corona and Dr. Melinda Brou School of Music

MCNAIR SCHOLARS PROGRAM

Background

My vocal professor, Dr. Brou, gave me pieces by composers Amy Beach and Isabella Colbran when I started my sophomore year of college and I didn't find it unusual to be assigned their compositions. I thought of them as part of the general word composer. But as Dr. Brou and I had conversations about diversity in the music educational curriculum, I realized that not many people had the same mentality as I did. Women composers existed but hardly existed in the standard repertoire assigned to students. I came to see that the lists of vocal compositions in competitions and anthologies published were dominated by men. I saw the magnitude of the problem and it influenced me to explore my topic.

Statement of Problem

If college graduates lack knowledge about female composers or have not performed compositions by female composers, how will they incorporate female selections in their classrooms? Long-held gender roles are starting to slowly rectify for female composers but continue to be suppressed. It is still necessary to take a proactive approach. In the words of Pauline Oliveros (1932-2016): "If a performer is playing a program, they need to play music by women as well as by men. And if an audience goes to a concert and there's no music by women, they have to confront the management about it. If that doesn't happen, the change is not going to take place."

Methods and Materials

This paper will demonstrate the lack of female composers represented in the most common published vocal anthology books and vocal solo competition repertoire lists in Texas. Throughout the paper, I will be including discussions with distinguished voice teachers and significant people at the forefront of vocal diversity research. I will also be recommending art songs composed by women for high school and college singers that can function just as well as the traditional male-dominant selections

The Texas State Solo-Ensemble Contest showing the number of female composers and their compositions on all 3 classes of the UIL PML.

Results

Results show that female compositions are woefully discounted in the NATS competition list, 38 published anthology books, and the list of vocal piece selections for all 3 classes on the UIL PML list.

Conclusion

Today's leading gender in the musical selections in Texas is the male composer. We see it within the choral canon, the selections provided in competitions, and the pieces given to students for those competitions. Most often, the repertoire assigned to students at the high school and collegiate level are compositions that have been done for years that educators have made it a routine to assign. Can you blame them? It is what they were taught. But now that we see problems that can arise when it comes to young female singers or Hispanic women wanting to pursue a career that doesn't feature possible models for them, we can be advocates for those composers. Not because we pity them but because they are exceptional composers. At the end of the day, female composers are composers.

Acknowledgments

I wish to express my gratitude to the women that have composed musical selections over time and those who have yet to be discovered.

A special word of appreciation goes out to my mentor, Dr. Melinda Brou, for enlightening me with such a topic. A truly inspiring person who has made an impact in my life.
